Sueton.* Consilio per conscios parum celato It can indeed be sometimes rendered by little, but this is not the whole of its meaning (at least in classical Latin). Sallust, however, in Jug. 85, 31. seems to have used parum to signify little. — II. PRÆTŌR (for prætitor, from præeo), ōris, m. properly, any leader, chief, head, president. Hence, the consul, as the chief magistrate, was formerly called prætor maximus. Liv. 7, 3. Also, simply, prætor. Liv. 3, 55. — Tacit. ærarii, h. e. president. — Particularly, a general, commander, στρατηγός. It is rarely applied to Roman generals, but very frequently to those of foreign nations, as, of the Athenians. Cic. and Nepos. Of the Thebans. Cic. — In civil life, a chief, director, head, superintendent. Tacit. ærarii. (See above.) The chief magistrate in Capua was called so, according to Cic. Agr. 2, 34; with us, the mayor. So, also, at Carthage. Nep. Hann. 7. In this passage, it is a civil magistrate. — Prætor is particularly a magistrate at Rome, who administered justice, and ranked next to the consuls. Cic. There were eight prætors at Rome in the time of Cicero. Of these, two were employed in causis privatis, h. e. private disputes concerning property. One of them was called prætor urbanus, who administered justice when the two parties were cives, h. e. possessed Roman citizenship. The other was called prætor peregrinus, who administered justice when both parties at variance, or only one of them, were peregrini, h. e. had not the right of Roman citizenship. The other six prætors were concerned with causæ publicæ, as murder, adultery, ambitus, &c. These eight prætors committed the examination of causes to subordinate judges, who were called judices selecti, and published the sentence of these judges, who formerly gave their votes viva voce, but afterwards on tablets. The prætors wore a toga prætexta, sat in sellæ curules, and were preceded by six lictors. Their office lasted a year. They afterwards went, as governors, into a province assigned to them by lot, in which there was no army. There they administered justice, performed the duties of the eight prætors at Rome, and were called prætores: though such a governor was frequently, also, called prætor. Cic. Verr. 2, 4, and 60, 4, 25, &c. The administration of all prætors, both at Rome and in the provinces, consisted in two things, viz. in edicto and decretis ex edicto. (See Jurisdictio.) — The office of prætor was first instituted at Rome, A. U. C. 388, partly because the consuls, on account of the many wars in which they commanded, could no longer administer justice; partly, that thereby the patricians might have a compensation for sharing the consulate with the people (plebs, the ignoble). — At first, there was only one prætor. Sulla made their number six; Cæsar, eight; Augustus made sixteen. — Cic. ad Div. 2, 17, 12. Prætor, for proconsul. — Cic. Prætor primus, h. e. who was first elected. By this some understand the prætor urbanus.
